Brazil to allow robusta coffee imports from Vietnam -report - Reuters News

SAO PAULO, Dec 14 (Reuters) - The Brazilian government is expected to allow coffee processors to import robusta beans from Vietnam for the first time in decades after drought hurt local robusta production, newspaper Valor Econômico reported on Wednesday. Agricultural Policy Secretary Neri Geller told Valor Econômico that the new policy should be finalized soon.

"The issue has been well-evaluated, and we should open imports for a limited period, and for a limited amount," Valor quoted the secretary as saying. Brazil, the world's largest coffee producer, has not allowed any imports of foreign beans for years due to concerns that they could bring diseases into the country. Local processors, particularly of instant coffee, for years have pushed the government to allow the imports as a way to increase supply and make the industry more competitive abroad. Robusta beans are normally used by instant coffee makers, while roasters prefer milder arabicas.

The Agriculture Ministry did not immediately answer Reuters' request for a comment. Coffee producers group CNA, which is against allowing any imports, said a final decision on the issue was still pending.

CNA said the current robusta supply crisis, caused by two years of drought in top-producing state Espírito Santo, is likely to end next year as the region's coffee fields recover. The government projects Brazil's robusta output this year at 8.35 million bags weighing 60 kg each, compared with about 13 million bags in 2014, before the droughts.
