Coffee Market Report

The rainfall reports from Brazil have indicated fair rains for most coffee districts this week and with forecasts for abundant rains for many districts, over the coming weekend. Thus, so far, it is looking to be a positive weather for the forthcoming 2018 new Brazil crop, while the rains contribute towards complacency on the part of the consumer industries and negative sentiment for the speculative sectors of the coffee markets.

There is meanwhile continued price resistance within the internal market in Brazil on the part of the arabica coffee farmers, for their new crop coffee stocks. With farmers holding back to take advantage of short sold exporters, whose offer prices are linked to the fortunes of the relatively soft New York coffee market. This scenario tending to indicate a potential tightening supply of Brazil arabica coffees in the coming months and ahead of the new crop in eight months' time, but it might be more the prevailing tight prices than the potential medium term arabica coffee supply, albeit that the most certainly is going to be less arabica coffee supply following this year's smaller crop.
