Coffee Market Report

The coffee markets remain devoid of striking fundamental news for the present, with the speculative and fund sectors of the volatile New York market holding significantly sold short on the perception of increased arabica coffee supply due for the second half of the year, with the prospects for a larger new Brazil crop.

The big question is which direction shall the presently flat coffee terminal markets go in the coming weeks as with the New York market presently well sold the downside potential would seem to be limited, which might be encouraging for some to look to buy in and profit. A factor that would be positive for the charts within the New York market and could trigger something of a rally, but with producer price fixation selling hanging over the market, likely to limit any short-term recovery within both markets.

The London and New York markets started trading around and either side of par yesterday, to see both markets taking an erratic sideways track close to par into the early afternoon trade. As the afternoon progressed the New York market started to dip back into negative territory, while the London market remained close to par and with the New York market bouncing back from the lows in later trade, both markets took a positive track for late in the day trade.

The London market ended the day on a positive note and with 75% of the earlier gains of the day intact, while the New York market ended the day on an even more positive note and with 86.1% of the earlier gains of the day intact.

This close and with the ability of both markets being able to show some buoyancy for late trade might be constructive for confidence and one might expect to see a follow through steady start for early trade today, against the prices set yesterday.
