Brazil's Large Coffee Crop Erodes Specialty Premiums

By Shruti Date Singh
(Bloomberg) -- (Corrects spelling of surname in first graph) Mechanization and improved husbandry of trees are among the factors that have helped boost the size of Brazil's crop, and producers now are struggling amid a rout in prices, Vanusia Nogueira, executive director of the Brazil Specialty Coffee Association, says in an interview at an industry conference in Boston.

* Brazil has so much coffee of all kinds, including higher-grade varieties, that sales of specialty beans at commodity prices are becoming common, she says

 "Now, we have a very big conflict in Brazil"

 "There is no premium" for many specialty growers because there is "a lot of coffee"

 "They are frustrated"

* With world prices weighed down by a surplus, her association and other groups "are trying to promote internal consumption"

* NOTE: Brazil is the world's top coffee exporter
